

Date: January 25, 2013
Circ: 2, 457

Ocean Vodka Review

Kevin Gray

Hawaii has experienced a bit of a distilling boom in recent years, with a number of spirits now produced on the island. So that makes Ocean Vodka, launched in 2006, a grizzled veteran of the Hawaii distilling scene. It's the official vodka of the Aloha state, and it holds another distinction as well, being one of only a handful of vodkas produced from organic sugar cane.

After distillation, Ocean Vodka is blended with mineral-rich deep ocean water (desalinated, of course) before bottling. The result is a spirit that's clean and mild on the nose. Drink up and you'll find a pleasant sugar cane sweetness, plus a touch of bitter/earthy minerals to round things out. Ocean has significantly more flavor than many vodkas on the market. To us, that's a good thing. To vodka drinkers looking for something damn-near tasteless, that may actually be off putting.

Either way, Ocean Vodka has plenty of application for mixed drinks, and that sugar cane base offers a welcome change of pace from wheat and potato vodkas. If you're in the market for a new vodka, this one's worth checking out.

Stats:

- 40% Alcohol by Volume
- $32.99

